Carla Goldberg: Water Under the Bridge

Carla Goldberg's new series "Water Under The Bridge" came about as a serious attempt to take control by letting go of things that cannot be changed. It's water under the bridge. The series sets out as a two-part exercise. First is creating works that capture in black and silver something reminiscent of rippling, swirling and flowing patterns in water under the shadow of a bridge. What seems dark is alive with patterns and glints of light penetrating the shadows. The second part of the exercise is to create a show using only reclaimed Plexiglas scraps that were otherwise destined for the dump due to scratches, left over end cuts and old rejected pieces that had dog hair from "Flea" her big fur baby, trapped in resin which made the art pieces unusable for their original purpose. Says Carla, "I never seem to throw anything away, even pieces with dog hair in it. I know down the road I will most likely find a way to create something out of seemingly useless materials but only if I put my mind to it."

Cecilie Beck:

Factory

I love looking through dirty windows, the smell of old dust, climbing breaking stairs, collecting forgotten tools, opening doors which haven't been opened for years, walking on fragile floors, running my fingers over crumbling wall paper, sneaking through dark humid basements, feeling the ghosts from another time, being alone in a forgotten building. In the show FACTORY you can catch a glimpse of the history of Beacon in a total installation that plays a soundscape produced by items found in the old industrial town. A town that hosts deserted secrets that aim to be told before Tioronda Hat Works – as the last historical factory in town is torn down as a part of yet another development project in yet another boom in Beacon. Once, before our time, this was a place where hard working women and men spent most of their days, weeks and years. They clocked in, served the machines, conversed over lunch while creating hats that was worn all over the country. Bright colored hats for Sunday mass, big shaded hats for sunny days, fashionable hats for a stroll down Madison Avenue in NYC.
